Captain TRIUMPH

The Invincible Combination: Michael Gallants body is dead--but his spirit lives to join forces with his twin brother, Lance, in the hour of need!--the two joining to become CAPTAIN TRIUMPH! Evil and oppression may threaten the WHOLE WORLD or its smallest part ---and CAPTAIN TRIUMPH throws himself into the battle! No fight too BIG--no fight too SMALL!

A touch of Lance's hand on the birthmark on his wrist
incorporates his brother's spirit to create
CAPTAIN TRIUMPH!

Unseen, all-seeing, the spirit of Michael Gallant roams everywhere... and in the remote reaches of Toar Valley he sees---

DON'T, MR. YORVEY!
DON'T WHIP MY FATHER!

HE'S GOT TO LEARN NOT TO ARGUE WITH THE KING OF TOAR VALLEY!

OF COURSE, APRIL, IF YOU DECIDED TO TREAT ME NICE, I MIGHT GET GOOD-NATURED ---

PLEASE GO,
MR. YORVEY!

SEE YOU AGAIN, APRIL, WHEN YOU'RE MORE SOCIAL!?

I'D LIKE TO CLIP THAT TYRANT! ... I'LL FOLLOW AND SEE WHAT'S THE STORY BEHIND THIS---

The valley tyrant rides into TOAR JUNCTION...

OH,
HELLO-O-O,
MR. YORVEY!

GOOD DAY TO YOU, BOSS!

WHERE'S

LOCK THE DOOR,
CHUCK! IT'S ABOUT
OLD FARMER JACKSON
I WANT TO TALK!
HE'S STILL STUBBORN!

YOU THINK HE MIGHT HAVE LEARNED ABOUT THE
...?

WHAT ABOUT YOU, CAPTAIN TRIUMPH?

HERE'S WHERE WE WORK SEPARATELY FOR A MOMENT! SEE YOU LATER!

THINGS ARE MOVIN' A LITTLE FAST FOR ME! WHAT NOW?

JUST COOPERATE WITH US FOR A MOMENT!

In the meantime...

YOU HEARD WHAT I SAID --- GET OUT THERE AND DRAW JACKSON'S FIRE!

I'D RATHER DIE BY HIS BULLETS THAN YOURS! HERE GOES!

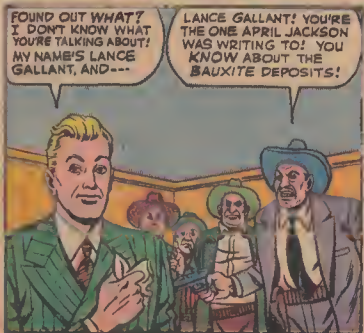

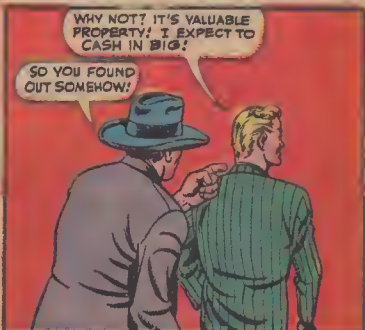

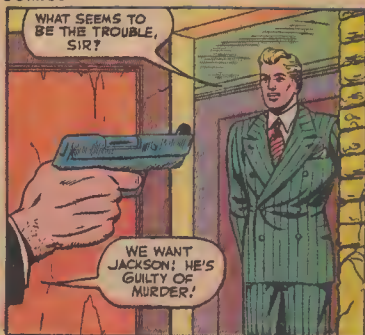

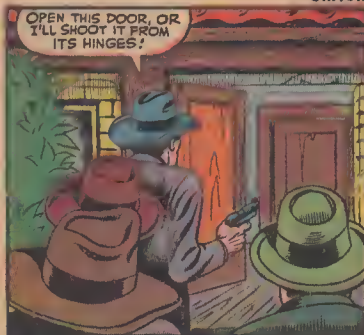

THAT GOT HIM! SPREAD OUT, GANG!

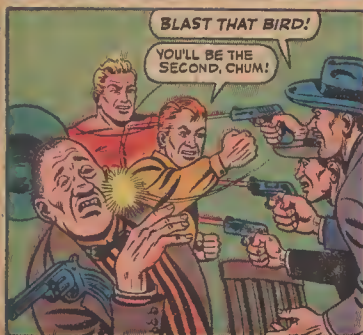

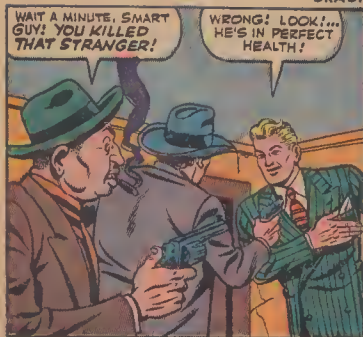

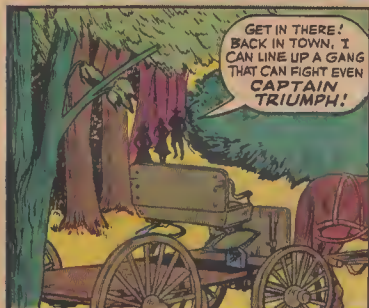

COME OUT HERE, JACKSON! YOU'VE KILLED A MAN-- YOU'VE GOT TO PAY THE PENALTY!

The PAPER DRIVE

PAPER Everywhere you look you are pretty certain to see paper in some form. There is paper everywhere. Yet there is a great shortage of this apparently common stuff. You are asked to save it in every possible manner. There are campaigns conducted in every city to gather all waste paper. Are you doing your share?

Eric Vale pondered this strange shortage of one of our commonest commodities, then set about finding out something about paper. He wanted to know its history. These are his findings.

Before the invention of paper the Chinese wrote upon strips of wood. This material was difficult to write upon, and difficult to store, especially after the invention of the hair writing brush. The Chinese made books and scrolls of silk which served well enough. But woven cloth was expensive, and there was waste when the silk manuscripts were cut and trimmed. It was these discarded strips of silk that no doubt suggested the possibilities of making paper. In arriving at the idea of macerating the waste silk fibres and "felting" them into sheets of paper, it is probable that the early Chinese craftsmen were aided by their knowledge of felt-making, a craft older than that of weaving. Cloth waste is still one of the best materials for making fine paper.

After the cloth scraps had been wetted, beaten and frayed into individual fibers the thick pulp was probably thrown into a tub filled with water. The difficult task was to devise an implement capable of picking up the matted fibers from the surface of the water which would nevertheless permit the water to escape, leaving the interwoven fibers in an even, homogeneous sheet. This need was served by the invention of the papermaking mould, the implement that has remained the principal tool in papermaking by hand and upon the principle of which the modern paper-machine is founded.

The first mould was probably a square of coarsely woven cloth held in a bamboo frame. This mould was dipped into the water upon which the fibers floated and then lifted while the water drained through the cloth. The mould, with the thin deposit of felted fibers adhering to its surface, was then placed in the sun for drying. The warp and woof of the mould cloth left their impressions in the paper.

To speed up the operation, the rigid mould from which a sheet of paper could be taken while moist was originated. These moulds were made of thin strips of rounded bamboo laid parallel and laced together at intervals with hair. The impressions of these bamboo strips and the hair lacings may be detected in the earliest known papers.

While almost two thousand years have elapsed since the invention of forming sheets of paper, the principle of the operation remains almost identical. Inasmuch as the first paper was made for the purpose of writing, the sheets had to be soft and absorbent so that the liquid pigment applied by the brush would dry rapidly.

The first papermaking in Europe was accomplished in the 12th or 13th century after its inception in China. The European papermakers devised moulds of wire, which lent themselves readily to the water-marking devices. The first watermarks appeared in European paper almost simultaneously with the introduction of papermaking.

After the invention of printing in the 15th century, paper became more and more in demand and there was a shortage of materials from which paper could be made.

In 1719, Rene Antoine Ferchault Reaumur, a French scientist, who had made a 20-year study of the life of the wasp, wrote a treatise in which his observations on the making of paper from wood were both practical and prophetic. It is well known that wasps make their nests from a kind of paper which they fabricate from wood, such as old fence rails, tree stumps and the like.

Not until 1765 were practical experiments made in fabricating papers from wood. These experiments include paper made from the wood of various trees and plants, stalks, leaves, barks, husks, tendrils, down and other forms, also nettles, moss, potatoes and their skins, as well as many additional species of vegetation. Regardless of the early 19th century experiments it was left for German and American scientists to finally perfect, in the middle 19th century, the making of paper from wood—the substance that in modern times furnishes the material for the great bulk of the paper in daily use.

Paper was used in early years for packages and labels, and by the end of the 18th century had become such a dominant factor in the life of every person that it was absolutely necessary to seek a way to increase its production. The hand mills, no matter how large or efficient, could not begin to supply the tremendous demand for paper. Various individuals tried to construct machines to make paper, but they were unsuccessful as their attempts were based on the principle of forming one sheet at a time. The earliest venture at devising a machine was along the line of a mechanical man, in an endeavor to duplicate the motions and performance of a worker forming sheets of paper by hand.

In the year 1798, Nicolas-Louis Robert, a Frenchman, invented the machine for making paper "in lengths of 12 to 15 meters." At the beginning of the 19th century workable machines for the fabrication of paper in a continuous web were constructed in England. From this period onward the development of the machine was rapid and the ancient hand presses gradually gave way to the new.

The handmade paper mills of Europe at the present time are operated solely for the production of fine and exclusive papers. In the Orient, however, handmade paper is an everyday commodity in use by all classes of people for many common purposes. There are thousands of hand operated paper mills and it is likely that in the Far East paper will always be made in this ancient, tedious manner.

In Japan, there are machines producing hundreds of feet of paper per minute. But this delicate and easily torn machine-made paper would not endure the ordeal of being made into windows, lanterns, partition screens, umbrellas, raincoats, bags, tarpaulins, and for other purposes where glass, metal, leather and cloth are employed by us. It is not uncommon to see Japanese paper umbrellas that have been in use for many years in Japan.

Along the country roads of Japan it is interesting to watch the many carts, each with its paper tarpaulin. These seemingly fragile paper coverings will endure the trying conditions they are subjected to year after year. The jinriksha men during the periodical rains wear mantles of oiled paper. The workers in the fields, the men laboring on the roads, and the watchmen at the railroad crossings depend upon coverings of paper to keep them dry. In the districts where tea is cultivated stout oiled paper bags are used for holding the leaves, and it is not unusual to see sacks that have given service for a half dozen years, literally covered with patchwork. Paper bags for storing grain are also common, for paper that has been tanned with the fermented juice of green persimmons is not easily destroyed by insects.

Throughout the Orient, paper holds a prominent place in all manner of ceremonies and festivals. In China vast quantities of these papers are fabricated to be converted into spirit money, tapers, incense wrappers, fire crackers, and to satisfy many other ceremonial requirements. In Japan, plain pieces of paper are folded neatly and placed in the temples, as paper even devoid of writing may be offered as a prayer to their ancestral deities.

The use of ornamental paper cut to represent various objects and burned at Chinese funerals dates from the very inception of papermaking and has continued through the centuries to this day, and each year thousands of reams of paper are consumed by the flames in ceremonial offerings. Objects of all kinds are constructed of paper and burned at the bier of the deceased so that the departed spirit may have an abundance of the things represented by the frail paper effigies. Highly ornate cardboard chests with shiny gold and silver paper locks, flowing robes of paper painted with golden dragons and complicated patterns, shoes, and hats, are all burned at funerals. For the funerals of the wealthy, the paper craftsmen also construct full-sized carts, horses, and even automobiles.

In the province of Chekiang more than 200 thousand people are wholly or partially dependent upon the making, decorating, and selling of paper used for sacrificial purposes.

Here in America we face a great shortage of all kinds of paper. Do your part in salvaging every scrap you can find.
